

Why I became a Platinum Member

I came across the Army Flying Museum by chance when a colleague asked me would I like to meet him there with our kids one Saturday. My twin boys were mostly oblivious at the time as they were being pushed around in a Pushchair. I had you down as one for the future.

By the time they were four (and my daughter was two), my sons were fascinated with all forms of technology – and the Army Flying Museum would become a firm family favourite. They love sitting in the café and watching various gliders take off from the Airfield next door. They love sitting in the different aircraft, dressing up in Uniform and playing in the soft play. Seb in particular loves your jigsaws – particularly the electronic Apache. We built your test engine every single time.

The enjoyment will change. In a few years, they will be too old for the Soft Play. They will be able to read about the different displays and understand the role of Military aviation over the years – and the future. They will understand the role that AEROMED plays in my line of work.

The consistent thing will be that we will be able to keep coming to the Army Flying Museum and it will be embedded both as a fun memory/place for my children and a distinct part of their childhood.
